Introduction

Painting has always been my hobby (well a compulsion really). For many years I was a consultant in marketing in the textile industry and then four years ago I decided to go and study art properly. I completed my degree in Fine Art at NEWI in North Wales. I now make my living teaching and painting.

Artists Statement

Landscape painters talk about trying to evoke their experience of a place both physically, such as the feel of wind on their face, and emotionally. They also talk about the 'Genius Loci' or spirit of the place. That is exactly how I feel about my work except that I'm painting people. My works are subjective and works of art in their own right - as well as being good likenesses. I express my experience of the sitter through my choice of colour (rarely literal) composition, gesture and facial expression

Statement

I like to meet and chat with the person I'm going to paint first and when they are at ease I then make a life drawing of them. This is to help me learn the shape of their face through close and extended observation - it is rarely the pose chose for the finished piece. I then take photographic references using a sensitive film so that I do not need to use a flash. Flashes are bad because they destroy shadows and shadows are needed to accurately describe the 3D shape of limbs on my 2D canvas.

I then go away and work out the composition of the painting and then make my own stretched canvas to fit the size and proportions needed. Once the canvas is primed I do a charcoal drawing on it. If I'm having trouble getting a good likeness at this point I stop and request another sitting. At this sitting I continue drawing directly on to the canvas. Once I'm happy with it (and I may prop it up in the studio and walk past it for days making little adjustments) I then fix it. I experiment with combinations of colours on a scrap of oil paper until I'm happy with my palette. This is usually restricted in order to give unity to the finished piece. Then I start painting on the canvas using the palette I've chosen.

The process takes about 10 to 12 weeks from initial sitting to delivery. It is advisable to varnish oil paintings 6 months after completion.

I'm very fussy about how my work is presented and I use a local framer who works for art galleries in my area. He customises frames to suit the piece. This can be done at cost
