Clare Shenstone

Biography

Introduction Clare Shenstone completed her MA at the Royal College of Art in 1979. She was told that a 'distinguished visitor' had been looking at her degree show and left his telephone number. She phoned: it was Francis Bacon, who said 'I love your work'. He wanted to buy a particular piece titled 'Janet', this had been the artist's first attempt at what she calls 'cloth heads'. Over the following two years she spent a lot of time with Bacon, making over fifty oil, gouache, pastel and pencil sketches of him. Since then Clare has exhibited widely across London and completed numerous other notable commissions including portraits of Zöe Wanamaker, Ronald Harwood and David Bowie.

Artist Statement

"My subject matter is the human spirit. This is a huge undertaking as, not only does each person contain a whole world of character, experiences and emotions unique to themselves but they reveal these gradually and change and drift from moment to moment. This is why I cannot simply produce one image of a sitter and say that is my portrait. Painting and drawing is a form of research, a desire for knowledge and understanding. I produce many different drawings and find, especially from one meeting to another, that the more I study a person, the more depths there are. I am seeking a combination of physical likeness and feeling or emotion which fuses, not in one moment, but through the experience of that person's presence over time. Parallel to this activity is my attitude to the means by which I make the image. You cannot communicate without language and I am continually trying to extend my visual vocabulary. I am always experimenting with materials in order to enlarge the possibilities of image making. The great portrait painters for me are those who combine technical brilliance and innovation with the greatest humanity."
